

HISTORY AND NATURE

Set in the northeast corner of the Green Swamp, a vast wetland in Central Florida, Lake Louisa is the largest in a chain of thirteen lakes connected by the Palatka River. The park contains 11 distinct natural communities, including: sandhills, scrub, upland mixed forest, swamp, marsh, wet flatwoods, hydric hammock, blackwater stream and old citrus grove.

Over the past 10,000 years, various Native American cultures have occupied the lands surrounding Lake Louisa. In 1823, the Treaty of Moultrie Creek designated this area as part of the Seminole Reservation.

In 1910, John and Louise Driggors Hammond settled most of the land surrounding Lake Louisa. The homestead included the family home, a turpentine still, sawmill, shingle mill, a combination school and church, commissary, worker's cabin and cooperage. The family exported their goods by way of steamboats and barges across Lake Louisa.

In 1943, the Bronson family acquired some of the property and established orange groves and a cattle ranch. Acres of old pasture and some of the orange groves from this era can still be seen in the park today. Purchased by the state in 1973, the Lake Louisa property became a state park in 1974 and opened to the public in 1977.

History still resurfaces today. During the 2001 drought, when the lake level dropped, two prehistoric dugout canoes were found in Lake Louisa. Later that year, remnants of a crashed P-51 Mustang were also found. Flown by First Lieutenant Dean R. Gilmore of Pennsylvania, the plane was lost on a training flight on November 14, 1944. A monument has been erected in honor of Lieutenant Gilmore and all aviators.
